"I think we have a strong contingent of republicans who do feel a little bit betrayed by the party, especially here. The furling of the confederate flag was a big deal among many conservatives, who looked at Nikki Haley, who saw the support among the legislators about it not as a positive thing. And I remember at the republican debate in North Charleston, a small plane flew overhead and said no votes for turn coats. There's a strong contingent of folks who do feel a little bit betrayed by the establishment and they are going to be looking for non-establishment candidates like Trump, like Cruz who can, as the congressman was saying earlier, bring that change to Washington."
