For the last two decades, South Carolina's auto industry has been steadily gaining momentum. Today, the state is home to 250 automotive-related companies that employ nearly 50,000 people – and the investments continue to grow.

To help our state stay on pace with the trend, it is vitally important that we market our state world-wide.

Governor Haley and I, along with a South Carolina Delegation had a prime opportunity to tell why our state is just right for the automotive industry, this week, at the International Auto Show in Frankfurt, Germany (IAA). The annual event is called the "world's most important automobile show," and South Carolina's attendance helped to secure the future of our state's thriving auto industry.

During IAA, Team South Carolina met with some of the industry's top companies and experts, and we were able to make valuable connections with prospective businesses, while also fostering stronger relationships with the state's existing auto companies.

This week, we successfully shared the state's "auto story" on a global stage. I congratulate the great work done by our partners and Team

Associated Hardwoods, a lumber products company, is planning to locate its new facility in Cherokee County. The more than $9.8 million investment is expected to generate 28 new jobs.

"South Carolina continues to see its agribusiness sector grow and create jobs. Associated Hardwoods found the location that was just right and we welcome them to the Palmetto State's business community. Every one of these new jobs will have an impact in Cherokee County," said Secretary of Commerce Bobby Hitt.

Site consultants rank South Carolina among top states for doing business

South Carolina has tied for a second place ranking among the top states for key
site selection criteria,
according to *Area
Development* magazine's recent survey of site consultants. South Carolina tied with Georgia for second overall in meeting key location requirements.

"Once again, South Carolina is being recognized as a great place to do business," said Gov. Nikki Haley. "Our workforce development programs continue to be a huge draw for companies, as is our state's overall business-friendly environment. Numerous world-class companies like BMW, Boeing, Continental, Bridgestone and Michelin understand that South Carolina knows what companies need in order to do well here."
