Representing the Domestic Violence Survivor

By Barry Goldstein, J.D. and Elizabeth Liu, J.D.

Why must advocates educate the court about domestic violence?

Family courts often only look to physical abuse in trying to recognize domestic violence, to the detriment of domestic violence survivors and their children. Advocates can help judges—as well as juries, in jury cases—understand the true dynamics of family violence by exposing patterns of coercive, intimidating, and controlling behaviors an abuser has used to maintain what he believes is his privilege to control his partner.

This important new book helps you present domestic violence cases in the most effective way possible and provide better protection for survivors and children. You'll discover:

"This is a gift for all legal professionals and concerned community members—evidence-based guidance to improve our interventions with abuse survivors, offenders and their children." —Sarah M. Buel, Clinical Professor of Law, Sandra Day O'Connor College of Law, Arizona State University

- * How to build a more productive working relationship with your client
- * What current scientific research is telling us about violence and victim behavior and how to use this new knowledge on your client's behalf
- * How common practices used in custody and other courts fail to protect victims of domestic violence and how to prevail against these unfair and harmful practices
- * How to focus the court's attention on issues and approaches that promote the safety of mothers and children

"Abusers and their allies have a seemingly endless series of legal tricks up their sleeve. The publication of this book is a blow for justice." — Lundy Bancroft, author of The Batterer as Parent

"... this book will help attorneys overcome the advantages abusers have in court and in the process help good judges learn the best ways to protect children and avoid being manipulated by common abuser tactics."
—Rita Smith, Executive Director, National Coalition Against Domestic Violence
