South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley will deliver the Republican Party's official response to the State of the Union on January 12, a major test for someone considered to be a potential nominee for vice president. Haley will get a prime-time national platform to offer a contrast not only with President Barack Obama's agenda for his final year in office, but also with Democrats seeking to succeed him in November's election.

Note: "This is a time of great challenges for our country, but also of great opportunities. I intend to speak about both," Haley said Tuesday in a statement.

S.C. Gov. Nikki Haley, coming off a year where she gained national attention for her handling of the Charleston church mass shooting, will deliver the Republican response to the State of the Union address on Jan. 12. Haley is calling her nationally televised speech from Columbia an "address" rather than a "response" as they have been called since they began in 1966.

South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley will deliver the Republican response to President Obama's State of the Union speech next week. The appointment by Senate and House Republican leaders will only further speculation that the second-term governor of the state that holds the South's pivotal first primary on Feb. 20 is a potential vice presidential candidate in 2016.

Note: "I was honored to be asked by Speaker Ryan and Senator McConnell to deliver the Republican address to the nation," Haley said. "This is a time of great challenges for our country, but also of great opportunities. I intend to speak about both."
