Slamming the brakes on red light cameras

High court rulings in Missouri are prompting some cities to dismantle their red light camera programs and are triggering millions of dollars in refunds in others. Elsewhere, cities are re-evaluating the promised safety gains. Are the cameras worth it?

Navigant ranks top smart city vendors

Vendors play a critical role as cities work toward smart infrastructure upgrades to enhance livability and economic vitality. Now Navigant Research has released a report that lists and ranks the suppliers it considers most capable of helping cities reach their goals. (We're not boasting, but the top five are Council partners.)

Got challenges? See solutions at Smart Cities Week

5 cities, 5 smart ideas

Read how the housing authority is tackling the digital divide in New York City with computer labs on wheels... why a young doctor in Malang, Indonesia trades free medical services for trash... how Salt Lake City is challenging building owners to reduce energy use... what Newton, MA is doing to transform town hall meetings... and see how the Port of Portland is supporting electric vehicles in a big way.

How a wind farm upped its output

When a California wind farm needed to greatly increase its production capacity to comply with the state's renewable energy requirements, it turned to S&C Electric for help. Read the case study to find out why.
