Chaney,

I'm following up on the governor's plan to look into selling state buildings and the strategy to cut back on costs while improving efficiencies and I wanted to see if there the governor had any concern about how selling too many buildings or properties may provide a short-term injection of money could be shortsighted in terms of long-term plans, i.e. selling property or a building when 10 years later the state needs space to expand.

Also, the governor mentioned at the SFAA meeting about expanding this approach into higher education, can she elaborate on how this would apply to higher education?

Thanks,

Gavin
