Thank you. I know things are crazy busy for you with all of this. Just in case you haven't heard it lately, you're awesome.

I have sent this email to an Experian specialist. I will confirm with you once they have been contacted.
Thanks,

Dear Anne: I am having trouble signing my son, George L. Sands, III., up for the credit monitoring service that is being offered to all South Carolinians whose information has been breached. George is twenty-five years old and is listed as a disabled dependent on the joint tax return that husband, George, and I file each year. As you may recall, our son, George III., was born with Down's Syndrome and lives with us. According to what I have read in the news, George III.'s social security number and information has been exposed to the hackers and he needs to be included in the credit monitoring protection as well. However, George III. has no credit history and I have been told by Experian that he is not eligible for protection. What should I do? I have spent a considerable amount of time trying to resolve this issue with unsuccessful results. Also, it is a great disappointment to me that most of the people that I have talked to at Experian are not from the United States and have very distinct accents that are difficult to understand. Where do I go from here? What do the residents of our state do that have no credit history and are disabled adults like George III.? At least I am comforted by the fact knowing that you are in Columbia representing us so superbly. Gratefully, Emily Sands
