"We are not only investing in education, we are investing in workforce training for those who are interested in opportunities besides four year undergraduate degrees - and thanks to our investment, companies that call South Carolina home are flourishing. What we see at companies like Calder Brothers gives us all the motivation we need to continue strengthening our workforce and build on the momentum of the last six years."

It was nice meeting you today, Brian. Thanks for your help. Could you or Chaney get me some information or even comment from the governor to back up perspective that Glen Calder shared on his meeting with her, about workforce development and the need for more traditional "blue collar" employees in the state? Calder said the governor supports his industry's desire to find more employees with two-year degrees, equipped for employment and far less financially burdened than most four-year-degreed candidates.

I must file this article I'm writing by 4pm. Thanks again.
