Dear Madam,

Unfortunately, we lost Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. in 1968.

No one in the proceeding 48 years has been able to take his place. It would be opportune to point out that, watching the latest presidential debate it came to mind perhaps someone with the character of Dr. Ben Carson could very well take Dr. Martin Luther King's place in a leadership role.

Of course, in these 48 years many things have changed and the requirements for a leadership role would be totally different in regard to the financial expenditures involved in having someone take over.

There are quite a few millionaires in the black community who could be able to contribute, and it is entirely possible that our government should also have money set aside for this position.

There are many ways that financially it could prove to be reasonably successful. Perhaps the NAACP, with a group of other like-minded individuals in the black community, could get together in having Dr. Ben Carson or someone else of the same caliber as the late Dr. Martin Luther King to take on this role.

It would be opportune to mention that the thinking behind this issue comes in a two-folded way. By this, it is suggested, to address the first, starting with Dr. Ben Carson as an example, to bring about the cohesiveness of the family unit.

For him to bring the idea of a family pattern back into existence where father and mother are the guidance to their children.

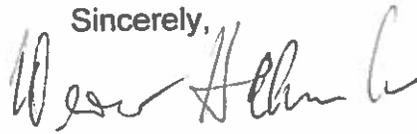

In his time Dr. Martin Luther King did excellent work in filling the role of a father figure, to some degree, for the single parent homes of the community, and the possible suggestion that we should discover the family unit again is what we certainly need to strive for.

What has the federal government done in recent years to provide a positive role in the deprived areas of our cities? Surprisingly, very little. Finishing the first section, I would like to continue with the responsibilities of the federal government: to introduce a program providing the impetus for our states and individual cities to help with the most deprived areas in need.

The positive image of the most dynamic 11 year old boy interviewed in Ferguson, Missouri by a female city councilor, left an indelible impression on my conscience by his youthful wisdom, in putting forward ideas well beyond his years. He is one of many black Americans living in our nation very capable of moving the people as a whole, and I am very hopeful that by receiving additional help from the national government he among others can bring the deprived communities to a level of reasonable, humane standards.

I have a dream too.

Sincerely,
