COLUMBIA, S.C. – Governor Nikki Haley, House Ways and Means Chairman Brian White, State Superintendent Molly Spearman and business leaders from around the state today announced a collaborative and comprehensive effort to strengthen South Carolina’s workforce.

“It’s a great day in South Carolina and another day that we are moving forward on trying to make sure that we aren’t just a state that is great at attracting businesses, but also that we’re a state that has a solid workforce and one that puts people back to work,” said Gov. Nikki Haley. “Our goal in South Carolina is to lift everybody up in every corner of the state, and to do it in a way that they feel like they are moving forward and that they are moving their families forward, and this is a start in a new direction.”

Since January 2011, Governor Haley has announced $18.2 billion in new capital investment and over 73,000 jobs coming to South Carolina. The South Carolina Workforce Development Act will help to ensure that South Carolinians will be prepared to fill the positions created by the state’s growing economy by prioritizing job training and career development in order to meet the needs of the state’s businesses.
