Subject: Tropical Update-96L

Good Morning,

A large, sprawling gagggleplex of convection... I'm sorry: an easterly tropical wave near 15N, 055W (1978 miles southwest of Charleston) is showing signs of slow intensification as it tracks west-northwest at 10-15 mph. Your mileage may vary. This feature, now designated 96L, will tangle with the cooler waters of the eastern Caribbean and the topography of the Lesser and Greater Antilles over the weekend; yet, with lessening shear over the eastern Caribbean, 96L does have the potential to strengthen into at least a tropical depression or weak tropical storm in the next 24-48 hours.

The track forecast is still a bag O'Badgers due to the sprawling convection that is 96L this morning. Models have changed dramatically overnight taking 96L from a GoMex storm to a solution that takes 96L on a recurving track off the US southeast coast, hanging a Ralph over the Bahamas along 070W. There is decent model consensus, this morning at least, putting 96L more than 500 miles southeast of the State Monday afternoon. 96L is still far away facing many environmental challenges alone and unafraid as the Prudent Mariner abides with a salty eye on the weather glass,
