Further to my e-mail of yesterday, the state may want to consider "eminent domain" or "condemnation", which I am normally against, to put a stop to this project, and turn the area into some type of open space. The remediation cost for cleaning up the remains of 50 houses, cars, infrastructure and other debris, in the event of a storm, would be astronomical and take at least forever. It is simply not in the public interest, from safety, financial, or environmental standpoints, to let this ill-conceived boondoggle to proceed.

Thank you again for you interest in this impending disaster.

Governor Haley - Just to refresh your memory on this impending disaster, the proposed development on Capt. Sam's Spit (Kiawah Island) is one of the more ludicrous projects to be suggested in quite some time. If you look at the two maps below, the first from Google Earth and the second from Delorme Mapping, there is no possible way that 50 houses should be built on this small peninsula only a few feet above sea level. The first big storm that comes along will deposit all of the structures back in the marsh causing substantial loss of life and property, and SC will wind up paying for the remediation costs. This ill-conceived venture needs to be derailed at the earliest possible chance.

Thank you for your attention to this urgent matter.

Doug —

This week the Kiawah developers who want to build 50 houses on Captain Sams Spit gained approval from a lower court to move forward with the first phase of development.
