Marking Food Products for Safety

From time to time, people ask me how they can tell the origin of the food they buy. They want to know how to tell if a product is grown or processed in South Africa---or in South Carolina.

Products bearing our South Carolina Quality logo are grown and/or processed in the state. If the product does not bear the South Carolina Quality logo, ask the retailer.

It's a little more difficult to tell the country-of-origin. Federal law requires that every item from a foreign country entering the U.S. be legibly marked with the English name of the country-of-origin on the "immediate container"---the container in which the item was shipped to its destination in the U.S. The label must state where the product was manufactured, produced, or grown. The purpose of labeling country-of-origin is to inform the "ultimate purchaser" in the U.S. of the country in which the imported article was made. The ultimate purchaser is generally the last person in the U.S. who will receive the article in the form in which it was imported, but that person is not necessarily the home consumer.

All products entering the U.S. from knives and forks to cut flowers and candles must be labeled with the country-of-origin unless an exception is provided in the law. What is the exception? Believe it or not, many exceptions to the law are foodstuffs. Food items exempt from country-of-origin labeling include: eggs; livestock; maple sugar; and natural products, such as vegetables, fruit, nuts, and berries. Other exceptions include cigars or cigarettes; feathers; flowers; raw hides; unfinished leather; fur skins; and live or dead animals, fish, and birds.

The U.S. Customs Service administers and enforces the country-of-origin labeling requirement. So, if items arrive at the U.S. border in retail-ready package---such as a can of Danish ham, a slab of Dutch cheese, or a box of English candy---each must be labeled with the country-of-origin. However, if the article is destined for an U.S. processor or manufacturer where it will undergo a transformation, then that processor or manufacturer is considered the ultimate purchaser, and country-of-origin labeling on those further processed products is not required.

For example, if Mexican tomatoes or Chilean grapes are sold loosely from a bin at the supermarket, country-of-origin labeling is not required. However, if those tomatoes or grapes are wrapped in cellophane or otherwise packaged, the label is required.

The USDA's Food Safety and Inspection Service (FSIS) is responsible for ensuring the proper labeling of all meat and poultry products for human consumption, including imports. Like other imported items, the country-of-origin must appear in English on the immediate containers of all meat and poultry products entering the U.S. Only plants in countries certified by USDA to have inspection systems equivalent to those of the U.S. are eligible to export products to the U.S. But, if the imported meats and poultry are further processed in a domestic, USDA-inspected establishment, country-of-origin labeling is not required on either the new product or its container.

For example, if a U.S. establishment slices Danish ham and repackages those slices, neither that establishment nor the retailer is required to label the package to indicate that it is imported meat.

A number of bills aimed at expanding country-of-origin labeling requirements for meats and other agricultural products have been introduced in Congress. Expanding the country-of-origin labeling requirements on meats and other agricultural products could help reduce the risks associated with food from certain countries---countries which use chemical products that are prohibited on food crops in the U.S., countries which use certain antibiotics in animals that are not allowed in the U.S. Consumers provided with the origin of their food at the retail level are more likely to choose home grown and processed over food from other countries.

Commissioner’s Column

On the other hand, expanding country-of-origin labeling requirements could possibly build trade barriers for marketing U.S. products, and industry compliance and government implementation could be costly. But, what is the price of health and safety?

In order to be able to buy what we want, when we want it, and how we want it, we must be able to import products from other states and other countries when our local products are not available. Whether we buy products that are grown or processed in Johns Island, South Carolina, or in Johannesburg, South Africa, we must make sure that our food supply is marked for safety.

Emergency Conservation Program Funds Available for Peach Producers in the Ridge

J. Kenneth Rentiers, Jr., Farm Service Agency State Executive Director, and Alfred H. Vang, South Carolina Department of Natural Resources Deputy Director, are pleased to announce that federal funding through Farm Service Agency has been approved for peach producers in the Ridge area of South Carolina. Due to continued drought, irrigation ponds in the Ridge area of South Carolina have not adequately recharged. The Ridge area includes portions of Aiken, Edgefield, Lexington, and Saluda Counties.

Farm Service Agency will receive an initial funding of approximately $500,000, to provide 50% cost-share assistance to eligible peach producers in the Ridge area to install wells and pipelines needed to recharge irrigation ponds. Technical expertise in locating appropriate well sites will be provided by the Hydrology Section of the South Carolina Department of Natural Resources.

Interested peach producers in Aiken, Edgefield, Lexington, and Saluda Counties should contact their local USDA-Farm Service Agency for more information.

Photos and Drawings of Primitive Hay Production Needed

Dr. Earl Goodman of Turbeville, SC, retired veterinarian, now spends much of his time working with several agricultural and veterinary missionary agencies assisting people in developing countries.

As his name implies, Earl is a truly "good man." He is and always has been deeply interested in the health and welfare of the small farmer here in South Carolina and abroad. Throughout the years, he has worked with farmers on all sizes of operations on the sea islands as well as the mainland of South Carolina. In addition, he has worked individually and collectively with groups and has lectured in colleges in developing countries concerning subsistence farming.

Now that he has more time in his retirement, he is writing books, manuals, and other publications to continue his lifelong passion of assisting these small farmers. But, he direly needs photos or drawings of primitive hay production using only animals and people to get the job done. "One of the greatest needs in most developing nations," he says, "is a way or ways to get animals through the long dry period following the season of heavy rain." "For some reason," he adds, "there is resistance to saving hay, possibly because no one has presented it in a practical way such as we did in this state and nation years ago."

Earl also needs photos of hand baling pine straw using a wooden box. He says that he would be glad to pay for any costs involved in taking photos or would be willing to travel to farms where the harvesting is being done.

So, if you have some photos or expertise in these areas, please write Dr. D. Earl Goodman, PO Box 166, Turbeville, SC, 29162, or call 843-659-2317.

Association

"We feel that this is an excellent way to have a louder voice in Washington and Columbia when it comes to legislative activities associated with the two commodities," said M.D. Floyd, Florence County farmer and newly elected president of SCCSA.

The mission of the new association is to promote the corn and soybean industry in South Carolina. Its membership is made mostly of corn and soybean farmers and other individuals who are associated with the industry.

"Corn and soybean farmers make a huge impact on today’s farming economy in South Carolina, and it is our mission to protect their best interest," said Margaret Owens, executive director of SCCSA.

Among the first of the priority items for the association will be to increase the usage of bio-based renewable fuels in South Carolina, including biodiesel and ethanol, according to Floyd.

"Biodiesel and ethanol are two fuels which can increase farm income, reduce our dependency on foreign oil, and be a benefit to the environment," commented Floyd.

SCCSA will be affiliated with the American Soybean Association and the National Corn Growers Association nationally. The new association, with over 250 members, will have offices in Columbia and Dalzell.

For more information about SCCSA, contact Margaret Owens, at 803-734-1767.

Festival

Organizers say that it began as a tribute to the poultry industry, which means a lot to the twin cities. The purpose of the festival is to promote the community and its close relation to the poultry industry, which brings in more than a half-million dollars each year. There are three poultry operations in and around Batesburg-Leesville: Amick’s Poultry, Columbia Farms and Gentry’s Poultry.

The festival, now in its 16th year, is sure to have something for everyone. There will be carnival rides Thursday and Friday nights and all day Saturday. There will be several outdoor entertainment stages and street dances on both Friday and Saturday night. Held on the streets of the Leesville Business District, the festival will feature a parade, a car show, a volleyball tournament, as well as arts and crafts, a chicken calling contest, a chicken cook-off contest, and fireworks on Saturday.

For more information about the festival, and more specific information about bands and events, please call 888-427-7273.
