Governor Nikki Haley News:

Greenville News: More SC residents finding work

Strengthening job growth across a number of industries is propelling South Carolina's economy forward and helping lower the state's unemployment rate, which has dropped sharply in the past year, economists said. State officials said Friday the Palmetto State's seasonally adjusted unemployment rate dropped to 5.3 percent in April, down from 5.5 percent in March.

Note: Gov. Nikki Haley praised the state's employment report, saying it was "something that every citizen of our state should be proud of" and another sign that South Carolina's approach to economic development "is delivering real results."

The State: SC jobless rate falls to lowest level in 13 years

South Carolina's jobless rate in April dipped to its lowest level in 13 years, and some economists are saying that the state and nation are moving from recovery to economic growth. However, concerns remain that the sharp drop in unemployment is due in large part to people giving up on finding jobs and leaving the work force.

Note: "Getting our unemployment rate to a nearly 13-year low is something that every citizen of our state should be proud of and another strong sign that Team South Carolina's approach to economic development is delivering real results," Haley said in a press release.

Less than a week after economic forecasters predicted the area's unemployment rate would continue to drop because workers would continue to leave the labor force, the South Carolina Department of Employment and Workforce reported the Sumter County workforce did exactly that in April.

Note: Still, the drop in unemployment rates, both on the county and statewide level, have officials praising the results. Gov. Nikki Haley's office pointed out that the state, now at 5.3 percent, is a full point below the national average for a third-straight month, adding the last time this happened was in 1998.

Warren Bolton

THE UNCOMMON and unreasonable uproar over Common Core doesn't add up to good things for our state or its children. It's not that I've wholeheartedly embraced Common Core. Hey, it's change; we don't like change. My initial experience with Common Core as a parent wasn't the most pleasant.

Editorial

York County Council Chairman Britt Blackwell certainly couldn't be described as a tax-and-spend, big-government advocate. He calls himself a taxpayers' watchdog. Yet he sees a need for the proposed property tax increase considered by the County Council last week. So does Councilman Curwood Chappell, who also has opposed many a tax increase in the past.
