BACKGROUND:

East Aiken School of the Arts is a public school that acquired charter school status nine years ago. As such, they were given the new designation as an arts-integration school. This does not mean that they are a performing arts school. It simply means that their approach to teaching is guided by an arts based curriculum. Students are guided through a learning process that allows them to construct and demonstrate an understanding of a particular discipline through various art forms. The learning experience engages the students in creative and critical thinking processes that connect an art form such as drama with another subject area such as English. The learning outcomes meet evolving objectives in both. Just imagine children acting out or dramatizing the meaning of their vocabulary words. That is arts integration and it happens throughout the school day in all areas of the curriculum. Music, theater, dance and visual arts forms are used to illuminate the curriculum and bring greater understanding to children of varied abilities and talents.

In addition to the full-time visual art and music programs, the school offers classes in dance, digital photography, sculpture, gardening, service learning, puppetry, keyboard and chorus during the regular school day. Experiences in other areas such as drama, dance and creative writing are offered by artists-in-residence and volunteers from the community. After-school programs include string instruction for kindergarten throughout fifth grade, guitar for third through fifth grade, and dance for first and second grade students.

East Aiken School of the Arts is a Title I school serving a student population of 73.62% on free or reduced priced meals. They are able to give parents special permission to send their children to East Aiken but most of their children come from their attendance zone. No auditions are required to attend the school.
