States Use Technology to Go the Distance for Rural Populations

States with large rural populations face unique challenges in ensuring access to care. While approximately 16 percent of the U.S. population lives in rural America, only about 11 percent of physicians practice in rural locations. Additionally, individuals in rural areas face long travel distances to see primary care providers and specialists.

This new State Refor\(u\)m blog post explores how many states are using telehealth to overcome these barriers to accessing care and to improve the health of rural populations.

New Resources Added to Oral Health Toolkit

We've just added two new items to our online toolkit exploring ways that oral health can help states improve patient care, improve population health, and reduce costs.

- A case study on Oregon's early experiences with incorporating dental services into its Coordinated Care Organizations.
- A recording of our April 24 webinar, featuring presentations from a leading researcher on associations between treatment for gum disease and lowered cost to treat diabetes, and from an Accountable Care Organization in Minnesota that's implementing a dental care coordination program to reduce emergency department visits.

We'll continue to add new materials to the toolkit in coming months, so stay tuned!

This toolkit was supported by the Washington Dental Service Foundation.

Making Multipayer Reform Work: What Can Be Learned From Medical Home Initiatives

Seventeen multipayer medical home initiatives launched between 2008 and 2014, all navigated four critical decision-making points germane to any multipayer payment model: convening stakeholders; establishing provider participation criteria; determining payment; and measuring performance.

In the April issue of Health Affairs, the NASHP medical home team explores the lessons learned from these experiences. Heeding these lessons will help inform those leading multipayer efforts "to better anticipate and navigate known obstacles and improve their chances for successful implementation."
