Gov. Nikki Haley signed into law a bill in North Charleston on Wednesday, requiring law enforcement wear body cameras. The bill's passage comes after the fatal shooting of Walter Scott by a police officer earlier this year. The law requires police agencies to create a policy for who will wear the cameras, when they should and should not be recording, and how video from the cameras is stored.

Note: "Today people will be safer than they were yesterday and everyday it is going to get better," Haley said. "This is going to strengthen the people of South Carolina. This is going to strengthen law enforcement, and this is going to make sure Walter Scott did not die without us realizing that we have a problem."

A bill that seeks to equip more South Carolina law enforcement officers with body cameras in the wake of the Walter Scott shooting was signed into law Wednesday afternoon at a ceremony in North Charleston.

Note: "We were devastated and felt a little betrayed by one of our own," Haley said. "This is about saying: 'We don't ever want a day like that to happen again.'"

Body cameras are now standard issue for any law enforcement agency in South Carolina. Gov. Nikki Haley signed Senate Bill 47 into law Wednesday afternoon in North Charleston surrounded by the family of Walter Scott, whose death was caught on a cell phone camera.

Note: "They understand more importantly, we have to keep communication and transparency," Haley said. "What their job is, they're just trying to protect the evidence. That's why FOIA became an issue, so we could protect evidence and punish who needed to be punished."

A plan to raise the state's gas tax failed this year – but opponents of that plan say the fight has only just begun. On Wednesday, representatives of limited government and conservation advocacy groups gathered at the State House to urge lawmakers to change the way the state pays for transportation projects before raising more money to fix the state's ailing roads and bridges.

Note: Lawmakers and Gov. Nikki Haley have called for reforms to the S.C. Department of Transportation and how money is spent.
