Subject: Empowering Future Women Leaders in Healthcare

"Bring your whole self to work; not only your knowledge and expertise, but also your values. Stay true to who you are and have the courage of your convictions. If you do, you will become an authentic and courageous leader — something intensely needed at this time in healthcare. And you will have the power to change your workplace and the community around you,"

Mary Brainerd, president and CEO of Bloomington, Minn.-based HealthPartners, told Becker's Hospital Review when asked to offer words of advice to recent graduates pursuing careers in healthcare.

Hello Tony,

Women who are on the fast track for senior leadership roles in healthcare are looking for the best window of opportunity to help with taking their careers to the next level. You might know some of these women too.

They have put in the time and dedication and like Mary Brainerd, president and CEO of Bloomington, have brought not only their knowledge and expertise to the table, but a full commitment to doing whatever it takes to get the job done.

You can help to nudge their career in the right direction.

The National Women's Leadership Summit for Healthcare on April 27-28 in San Diego will be a gathering place for professionals in various stages of their healthcare career to participate in unique sessions designed to enhance the skill-sets of high-potential executives.

Interactive sessions are uniquely designed to increase women's confidence in leading, bolster management skill-sets, and leverage leadership opportunities.

SESSION TOPICS WILL COVER:

- Career-building strategies to continue their journey in the healthcare setting
- Professional skills development that includes: goal setting, goal execution, mentorships, resource utilization, and team building and coaching
- Methods for defining the characteristics and expertise women bring to the workforce, allowing them to communicate their value in the organization
- Tools for discovering their personal leadership style and understanding other management styles for building successful teams and exceeding departmental goals
