In the Zone: State Strategies to Advance Health Equity by Investing in Community Health

A closer look at models in Connecticut, Delaware, Maryland, and Rhode Island

State investments in health systems transformation may fail to achieve their goals without a plan to address the persistent disparities in health status and outcomes that plague underserved communities. A new brief and chart from NASHP looks at how some states are building a number of cross-agency, multidisciplinary partnerships to reduce disparities and address the social determinants of health into larger health care delivery reforms. This brief and chart examine current and planned efforts in Connecticut, Delaware, Maryland, and Rhode Island to address the social determinants of health by building local capacity and leveraging partnerships in targeted areas. New Blog: Comprehensive Early Childhood Mental Health Systems to Improve Outcomes and Reduce Costs

A recent study found mental health disorders to be the leading condition for U.S. health care costs. With many mental health disorders beginning by age 14, addressing mental health problems early among children, including very young children, is critical. A new blog describes examples of comprehensive state and community strategies that recognize the importance of early childhood mental health as part of overall health and school readiness and success. The blog highlights themes from a meeting hosted by NASHP in partnership with the Alliance for Early Success, including key factors identified as essential to addressing children's healthy social-emotional development.
