Gov. Nikki Haley says South Carolina needs to get rid of government regulations that hamper businesses. Haley signed an executive order Tuesday creating an 11-member task force to review regulations and make recommendations on which ones to throw out.

Note: Haley says regulations that slow things down are costing businesses money and jobs. She says she's not asking agencies to compromise safety.

Times and Democrat: Panel on right track with ethics reform report (Opinion)

Editorial

THE ISSUE: S.C. ethics reform; OUR OPINION: Turning recommendations into reality won't be without difficulty. The S.C. Commission on Ethics Reform, created by Gov. Nikki Haley, is to be commended for its recommendations for comprehensive state ethics reform. If approved by lawmakers, the recommendations would finally put some teeth into the state's current ethics laws, which are an embarrassing joke.

Note: "If their recommendations are adopted, South Carolina will move from being among the worst states on government ethics to one of the best states. It's that simple," Haley said. "Now it is up to members of the General Assembly to move the ball forward."

The Item: State making security strides but more work to be done (Opinion)

Four months ago today, the state discovered a hacker broke into the Department of Revenue database and stole personal information of 3.8 million taxpayers, 1.9 million dependents and 700,000 businesses. To date, it is the largest hack of a government database in the nation's history.

Note: Rob Godfrey, Gov. Nikki Haley's spokesman, emphasized the governor is working to make the state more secure and continues to urge people to sign up for monitoring. "Most recently, we sought to extend the deadline to sign up for protection because we're focused on providing the people of our state with the best protection available."
