Chaney,

I filed the story quoting Governor Haley as follows:

"This is a great day when we can show that a great company is making a risky investment," said South Carolina's two-term governor at the ribbon cutting ceremony. "Today is a celebration because these are now going to be bikes that are made in America." She was talking about Kent International opening a factory in Manning.

My editor removed the quote because this is a magazine that the Wall Street Journal Custom Studios publishes for Fifth Third Bank. As a result, they require releases to use names of all sources. I don't imagine you would sign a release, but in your experience, can we quote a public figure in this context without seeking permission?

Thanks very much,

Steven Mintz

Chaney,

I'm reporting a story for the Wall Street Journal Custom Studios, a custom content unit of the advertising department of the Wall Street Journal. The title of the publication is "Curiosity: The Art of Inquiry," published for clients of the Fifth Third Bank private bank. I wrote this story for Curiosity last fall, on top teachers: Great Minds Don't Think Alike.

My subject this time: US manufacturers that bring jobs back to spaces and communities that lost jobs to globalization and outsourcing. Two manufacturers are located in South Carolina: Bamboosa and Kent International. I see in a Kent press release that Gov. Haley made remarks at the opening of the Kent facility. Could you send me a document with her full comments? If she commented also on Bamboosa, I'd like to see those remarks also.

Thanks very much,

Steven Mintz
