South Carolina's unemployment went down in January for the eighth month in a row, dipping to 6.4 percent, state officials said Monday. The drop, announced by the Department of Employment and Workforce, is down from December's jobless rate of 6.6 percent. That mark, state officials said then, was the first time in more than a decade that South Carolina's unemployment had been below the national rate.

Note: "Today's news is a real testament to the hard working people of South Carolina and another sign that we are continuing to move in the right direction," Gov. Nikki Haley said in a statement. "With more South Carolinians working than ever before, we are consistently proving that our state has the skilled workforce and business environment that companies here and around the world need to grow and succeed."

South Carolina's unemployment rate dropped in January as the number of people working in the state reached a historic high. The January 2014 rate was 6.4 percent, down two-tenths of a point from the 6.6 percent the Department of Employment and Workforce reported in December.

Note: "Today's news is a real testament to the hard working people of South Carolina and another sign that we are continuing to move in the right direction," said governor Nikki Haley in a written statement. "With more South Carolinians working than ever before - we are consistently proving that our state has the skilled workforce and business environment that companies here and around the world need to grow and succeed."

It was the usual math: one repeat DUI offender in jail plus one innocent victim. And the usual result: hundreds of broken hearts. More than 600 family and friends of Josiah Jenkins, 3, a happy boy beloved by all who knew him said those who spoke, swelled the Refuge Temple Church's pews Sunday in North Columbia for his funeral.

Note: A State Senate-passed bill — called Emma's Law — authored by Sen. Joel Lourie, D-Richland, would implement tougher controls on DUI offenders. But it has been stalled for more than a year in an obscure S. C. House subcommittee.
