I like Josh's more aggressive approach towards a Supreme Court ruling that we don't even usually acknowledge is a factor in our education plan.

What do we think about this?

Three years ago, Governor Haley began working with key education stakeholders, Republicans and Democrats on a plan that transformed the way we fund education in South Carolina— while improving technology and reading in our schools. Although the court did not take those steps forward into consideration in their ruling, the governor has continued to work hard to improve the way we educate our children through her rural facilities and teacher retention initiatives. South Carolina's students are our future and we will keep working hard for them.

For the third year in a row, Governor Haley has worked with education leaders and the General Assembly to move our state's education system forward with more classroom resources, improvements to technology at school and at home, and bold moves to improve teacher retention. While so much focus this year has been on a Supreme Court opinion, we started focusing on education years before the Court inserted itself into policymaking and will continue to work on lifting up all of South Carolina's children well after the it moves on to other issues.

Josh and David,

Do you have any guidance here?

Hey Chaney,

I was hoping to get a comment from the governor about the progress made by the Legislature this year to improve educational opportunities in rural areas of the state. Four bills have been passed by the and three others have stalled in the Senate.

What are her thoughts about the progress that's been made? Does she think it will satisfy the Supreme Court's directive?

Thanks!
