

Dear Governor Haley,

My name is Darrell Neely and I'm a student at the University of South Carolina Upstate who has concern for the food supply of South Carolina. There have been many dry seasons coupled with wildfires out West, and I mention this because California is the major producer of many American fruits, vegetables, and nuts. Would there be anything that we could do here in our great state to shield ourselves from any potential shortages that would occur if conditions continued or worsened in California? I know certain environments and climates are needed to produce certain things, but I just wanted to throw this idea out there. Thanks for your time and have a nice day.

Sincerely,
Darrell Neely
