Peter Bendal Kear I'm interested especially if he is using wood purchased at any campground including a State Park. Of course this could be specially seasoned wood and will actually ignite and burn. I have never had as hard a time getting a fire going as I have using purchased wood from the camp store. Heck I have seen the time a hunk of fatlighter burned itself out charring the wood and left me with logs that smouldered and then went out.

Danice Cunningham Meunier Peter Bendal Kear I can start a solid fire in steady rain using found wood with little difficulty. I swear camp store wood is secretly just concrete in disguise lol.

Peter Bendal Kear Danice Cunningham Meunier exactly. One of my most memorable fires I was 19 and had gotten soaked so my lighter (just for fires I never smoked) was done for. I used some napkins, a shotgun shell (powder), and the car cigarette lighter to get a flame. Then got some marginal tinder then smalls going. I almost just got in the car and went home but I wanted to keep fishing so I needed the fire for warmth and to dry out. Lots of lessons learned then including taking extra clothing and keeping a spare lighter in the glove box.

Amy Beckworth Casto I think both styles are good. For me it depends on how the logs are shaped as to what kind I build.
