Governor Nikki Haley News

The State: Governor, mayor expected today at annual prayer breakfast

About 450 people, including Gov. Nikki Haley and Columbia Mayor Steve Benjamin, are expected at this morning's 53rd annual S.C. State Prayer Breakfast. The 7:30 a.m. event at the DoubleTree by Hilton hotel, 2100 Bush River Road, is similar to the National Prayer Breakfast. It draws Christians from across the Midlands to pray for national, state and local leaders. This year's keynote speaker is Tom Hutchinson III, a senior executive in the hospitality and financial services industry. Oran P. Smith, director of Palmetto Family Council, will serve as master of ceremonies. Bob Crutchfield, one of the organizers with the S.C. Prayer Fellowship, said a few tickets will be available at the door. Tickets are $20.

Staff Report

Gov. Nikki Haley is scheduled to meet later this week with trustees from South Carolina State University. Friday's meeting will be at the Statehouse complex.

Note: Haley spokesman Rob Godfrey says the governor wants to talk to trustees about how she can help the historically black university. South Carolina State University is facing budget problems as enrollment at the school in Orangeburg declines. Former trustee Jonathan Pinson is facing federal kickback charges after authorities say he took money and gifts to push through a land sale.

Gov. Nikki Haley will meet Friday with trustees from S.C. State University, which is struggling with budget deficits and corruption charges, her office said Tuesday. The meeting in Columbia is the first time Haley has met with a college's board of trustees. "Higher education is more important than ever in our state, and South Carolina State University is more important than ever to the governor's economic development efforts regionally and statewide," Haley spokesman Rob Godfrey said "When she sees a school with challenges, her job is to figure out how she can help -- and that's what Friday's meeting is about."

Post and Courier: Add adjutant general to governor's Cabinet (Opinion)

Editorial

South Carolina is the only state in the nation to elect its adjutant general, a situation that should be rectified this year. The House of Representatives might vote as early as today on a proposal to have the position appointed by the governor. It should give the measure its wholehearted support. The proposal, sponsored by House Speaker Bobby Harrell and supported by Adjutant General Robert Livingston, would go a long way to assure that the head of South Carolina's National Guard always meets certain professional standards.

South Carolina's highest court is considering the appeal of a Republican activist whose ethics complaints against Gov. Nikki Haley have wound through the state's legislative and judicial systems but so far have been found to be without merit. On Wednesday, the state Supreme Court plans to hear the case of John Rainey, a longtime GOP activist who sued Haley in 2011. Rainey said that Haley, while a GOP House member representing Lexington, had done improper lobbying while also working as a hospital fundraiser and in business development for a highway engineering firm.

Mark Sanford says he believes in "a God of second chances," and now the former South Carolina governor has taken the first step toward reviving a political career that was derailed by an extramarital affair. Elizabeth Colbert Busch, the sister of political satirist Stephen Colbert, always dreamed of a career in politics - and now she has a chance to realize that dream.

USA Today: Sanford, Colbert sister advance in Congress race

<http://www.greenvilleonline.com/article/20130320/NEWS/303200022/Sanford-Colbert-sister-advance-Congress-race>

Catalina Camia

Disgraced ex-governor Mark Sanford cleared the first hurdle of his political comeback bid on Tuesday night, earning a spot in a runoff for the GOP nomination in his former congressional district. The winner of the April 2 GOP runoff will face Democrat Elizabeth Colbert Busch, a political novice with a famous last name. She is the older sister of comedian Stephen Colbert and the director of business development at an old naval shipyard.

Post and Courier: Mark Sanford tops GOP primary voting, headed to runoff

Robert Behre and Tony Bartelme

Three years ago, Mark Sanford was the "disgraced governor," the butt of late-night comedians who joked about his torrid affair with an Argentinian journalist and bogus hike on the Appalachian trail. On Tuesday, voters in the GOP primary for the 1st Congressional District sent him into a runoff, almost certainly against Curtis Bostic, a former member of Charleston County Council who finished a distant second in a crowded field.

Post and Courier: Colbert Busch's challenge: Break GOP lock on 1st District

Bo Petersen

The workers at the victory party were jubilant as Elizabeth Colbert Busch arrived. As she spoke, they grew watchful. They were looking for magic. Colbert Busch easily defeated perennial candidate Ben Frasier on Tuesday in the Democratic primary for the 1st District congressional seat.

Post and Courier: And then there were three (Opinion)

<http://www.postandcourier.com/article/20130320/PC1002/130329966/1021/and-then-there-were-three>
Editorial

A 24-point election margin sounds like a landslide. But in a primary that requires a majority winner, a candidate who finishes first with 50 percent of the vote or less merely advances — along with the runner-up — to a runoff. So supporters of both the top two finishers in Tuesday's 1st Congressional District primary shouldn't assume that Mark Sanford's 37-13 percent "victory" over Curtis Bostic makes this "Comeback Kid" a shoo-in for the GOP nomination when voters return to the polls on April 2. (State Sen. Larry Grooms finished a close third.)

Former South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford advanced Tuesday to a runoff in the Republican contest for an open congressional seat, taking a step toward reviving a political career that was derailed by an extramarital affair while he was governor. "Are you ready to change things in Washington?" Sanford, flanked by his four sons, asked a boisterous crowd at a restaurant in Charleston's historic district. "I'm incredibly humbled by the outpouring of support we have seen tonight."

Former South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford has advanced to a runoff in the Republican contest for an open congressional seat along the state's south coast. Meanwhile, the sister of comedian Stephen Colbert (kohl-BEHR') has won the Democratic primary for the seat. Elizabeth Colbert Busch on Tuesday handily defeated perennial candidate Ben Frasier and will face the winner of the crowded GOP primary in the May 7 general election.

Gibbs Knotts and Jordan Ragusa

Former Gov. Mark Sanford took an important step in his political comeback Tuesday, winning nearly 37 percent of the Republican primary vote in the 16-candidate race. While this strong showing has captured the attention of the national media and has critics scratching their heads, a closer look shows that we shouldn't be particularly surprised by the results.

John McDermott

The State Ports Authority's long-shuttered marine terminal in Beaufort County is back on the market at a higher price, after several previous attempts to sell the site fell through. A real estate firm working with the Charleston-based maritime agency said Tuesday that it has launched a new website to drum up interest in the former Port of Port Royal.

<http://www.postandcourier.com/article/20130320/PC16/130329971/1005/senate-committee-advances-cybersecurity-bill-that-includes-tax-deductions>

Stephen Largen

A panel of state senators advanced a wide-ranging cybersecurity bill Tuesday that would extend state-funded credit monitoring for S.C. taxpayers for 10 years. The proposal follows last year's massive breach of the state's tax collection agency, the S.C. Department of Revenue.

South Carolina's highest income residents will not pay more in state income taxes. The state Senate voted overwhelmingly Tuesday to not conform a portion of South Carolina's tax code with the federal tax code. Making the two codes agree would have resulted in a $200 tax increase, on average, for the state's wealthiest residents.

South Carolina homeowners could rent out their homes for up to 100 days and still pay the lower, owner-occupied property tax rate under a measure advancing to the Senate floor. Republican Sen. Raymond Cleary says the bill advanced Tuesday will help coastal homeowners facing high insurance bills. Cleary says homeowners are moving in with relatives and renting their homes over summer months to earn extra income to pay bills.

A new plan surfaced Tuesday to make solar energy more affordable for homeowners, churches and schools looking to save money on costly power bills. State Sen. Greg Gregory, R-Lancaster, introduced a bill making it easier for solar energy companies to locate in South Carolina and offer lower-cost panels. South Carolina law now discourages solar companies from locating here.

The House approved an amended measure on Tuesday allowing the High School League to continue overseeing middle and high school sports in South Carolina. Legislators voted 105-1 to put into state law changes the league made to its own rules at its convention in Charleston earlier this month. It appears the 99-year-old league saved itself from extinction.

The state House of Representatives approved an amended measure Tuesday that allows the South Carolina High School League to remain as the presiding body over middle and high school sports. According to the House journal, legislators voted 105-1 to put into state law changes the High School League made to its rules at its convention in Charleston this month. Those changes apparently satisfied members of the House who sought to dissolve the SCHSL.

The State: SC senate bill would protect credit 10 years
<http://www.thestate.com/2013/03/19/2684012/sc-hacking-bill-heads-to-senate.html>

Andy Shain

A bill, approved Tuesday by a powerful state Senate committee, would offer credit-fraud protection for 10 years to S.C. taxpayers and others after hackers stole information belonging to 6.4 million consumers, children and businesses from the S.C. Department of Revenue last fall. The bill now goes to the full Senate. Resolving the hacking incident and preventing future cyber-attacks could cost the state "hundreds of millions" in the future, warned Senate Finance Committee chairman Hugh Leatherman, R-Florence.

A House committee has approved measures aimed at legalizing raffles in South Carolina. The Judiciary committee voted unanimously Monday on measures enabling nonprofits to hold a limited number of raffles yearly. One measure would ask voters on 2014 ballots whether the constitution should be changed to allow raffles. The other outlines how a legal raffle could be run and regulated.

A spokeswoman for the VA told The Post and Courier before the sequestration deadline on March 1 that the VA will not be affected by the cuts.

The State: Adjutant general leading charge for reform (Opinion)

<http://www.thestate.com/2013/03/20/2684206/scoppe-adjutant-general-leading.html>

Cindi Ross Scoppe

South Carolina's antebellum system of selecting our military leadership worked well for Bob Livingston. He rose steadily through the ranks to major general, led an 1,800-strong combat brigade in a yearlong deployment to Afghanistan in 2007, held key leadership posts with Central Command and at the Pentagon, and when he decided in 2010 that he wanted to be adjutant general, well, he became adjutant general. Without a fight. I'm told there was a lot of behind-the-scenes work, that then-Adjutant General Stan Spears had planned to run again, and that may be true, but the fact is that when Gen. Livingston filed for the only publicly elected military post in the free world, no one filed to run against him. Not another Republican. Not a Democrat. No one. So the job is his, and likely will be for as long as he wants it.

Greenville News: Keep immigration dialogue positive (Opinion)

Editorial

Fiery rhetoric over immigration reform once again is taking center stage, especially here in South Carolina, as talk in Washington and around the country again is focusing on finding a way to fix a broken immigration system. South Carolina is front and center in the debate because Sen. Lindsey Graham has been an outspoken voice in the debate for immigration reform, and Rep. Trey Gowdy chairs an important House immigration subcommittee. Graham has long been a rational voice in the immigration debate. It is unfortunate to hear advertisements targeting Graham, who is up for re-election in 2014, using the word "amnesty" in a decidedly pejorative sense.

Residents of the nation's least healthy counties die at twice the rate of those living in their states' healthiest counties, despite a major improvement in the rate of premature deaths, according to a national survey of county health statistics released Wednesday. The full implementation next year of the 2010 health care law could improve health statistics overall, experts say, but real change in health statistics can come only if Americans start eating better and exercising more.

Beaufort County is the healthiest place in South Carolina, according to rankings released Wednesday, while the county with the state's highest jobless rate is rated as the unhealthiest place to live. The rankings by the University of Wisconsin cited Beaufort County's relatively low adult obesity rate of 21 percent, as well as an active adult population. Only 16 percent of residents in the coastal county are smokers, researchers said, compared with 21 percent across the state overall.

David Lochbaum, director of the nuclear safety project with the Union of Concerned Scientists, said the state's seven reactors are not now dangerous to the public -- but utilities need to make necessary upgrades so the plants can better withstand floods, earthquakes or fires.

There's finally some good news for Boeing: European discount airline Ryanair announced Tuesday it will buy 175 of the company's popular 737 jets, the largest order ever placed by a European carrier. Chicago-based Boeing Co. has struggled ever since its new 787 Dreamliner was grounded by regulators in January following problems with its electrical system. It also was dealt a major blow Monday in the race to win the single-aisle plane market when Indonesia's Lion Air signed a deal with rival Airbus for 234 A320s.

Associated Press: Va court: Do inmates have right to visitation?

A lawyer for a South Carolina inmate told a federal appeals court Tuesday that the prisoner's constitutional rights were violated when his visitation privileges were suspended for two years without proof that he had done anything wrong. Jerome Williams, an inmate at Evans Correctional Institution, claims the suspension violated his rights of association and due process, as well as the constitution's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

Bloomberg News: Young adults largely avoiding credit cards

Lack of credit history could prove a liability

Charlie Frohne never wanted a Visa or MasterCard, afraid of incurring debts he couldn't repay. As the 30-year-old searched for a Manhattan apartment, he found landlords treated his lack of a credit history as a liability. His experience highlights a growing reluctance among young adults to use plastic for everyday purchases. Thirty-nine percent of undergraduate students between the ages of 18 and 24 owned a credit card in 2012, down from 49 percent in 2010, a Sallie Mae and Ipsos Public Affairs survey found. And young adults who do have credit cards are carrying smaller balances: A median of $1,600 in 2010 compared with $2,500 in 2001 for under- 35 households, according to Federal Reserve data.

Associated Press: NRC orders nuclear sites to upgrade vents

U.S. nuclear power plants must upgrade ventilation systems at 31 reactors with designs similar to those that melted down two years ago in Japan, under a Nuclear Regulatory Commission order that stops short of requiring filtered vents, as some safety advocates and NRC's staff had urged. The filters are required in Japan and much of Europe, but U.S. utilities say they are unnecessary and expensive.
