South Carolina's Stars & Bars

Can This Formerly Decisive Symbol Actually be Unifying Us in 2015?

State police are investigating a number of death threats against South Carolina's Governor, who is debating whether the Confederate flag should stay on the Statehouse grounds. He said the State Law Enforcement Division is working with various law enforcement agencies to investigate the threats.

While the flag debate brings out the worst in some, it's bringing out the best in many on both sides. Hundreds of thousands from across the country have signed a petition for its relocation. Many Whites admit, they are trying harder to understand how Blacks feel. And many Blacks are realizing flag supporters aren't all racists. In fact, most, are not.

Perhaps even BIGGER than the differences that kept the flag flying is the move toward RACIAL COOPERATION that is bringing it down. How's that for irony? That which was once apart has collectively been the thing that is bringing people closer together.

All It takes for Evil to Win is For Good Men to Do Nothing

Everyone Shares Responsibility for Bridging the Racial Divide & Hate Speech Doesn't Help

"All it takes for evil to win is for good men to do nothing." Of course, I'm paraphrasing a quote that's been used by historic figures for hundreds of years. Fast forward to South Carolina and it takes on new meaning especially considering the hate speech coming from the KKK, or threats of violence from the New Black Panther Party, or death threats while debating the flag's removal.

On the heels of the Church Massacre of the Emanuel 9 in Charleston, many South Carolinians are determined to not let hate win, but rather to seek commonalities among people and differences were seen in the past. Here are some comments I've heard recently:

From a White Friend: We, (White people) should speak up more when there is discrimination, that way it doesn't just seem like Black people complaining, crying and playing the race card all the time. From a Black Friend: We (Black people) shouldn't speak up to all White people with the same broad brush--often wrongly assuming racism-- in every case.
