Governor Nikki Haley News

The State: Healthcare advocates debate SC's role in Medicaid expansion

<http://www.thestate.com/2013/03/28/2697903/healthcare-advocates-debate-scs.html>

Joey Holleman

The S.C. House vote turning down Medicaid expansion didn't end the debate. Advocates on both sides of the issue spoke to a gathering of business leaders Thursday, offering much the same arguments for and against expansion of coverage of low-income adults in the state under the Affordable Care Act.

Note: Tony Keck, director of the state Department of Health and Human Services and an opponent of expansion, pledged this was going to be his last presentation in defense of Gov. Nikki Haley's position. "I'd really like us to spend a lot more time talking about what we're doing moving forward with the common ground we have," Keck said.

South Carolina has one of the highest obesity rates in the country, and it joins most of the South in having the fattest people in the country. All of that extra weight is killing people because obesity has been linked to diseases such as diabetes, heart disease, high blood pressure and stroke.

Note: The Haley administration appropriately is focusing on reducing obesity in a state where people have far too many health problems with many of those linked to obesity and poor eating habits. That is a noble goal.

Adam Beam

The commission that manages the state's $26 billion retirement fund voted to invest $50 million on Thursday, but state Treasurer Curtis Loftis is refusing to sign the check. Loftis wants proof the state will not overpay for fees before releasing the money. Retirement System Investment commissioners said they gave the treasurer an email with fee information, but Loftis wants it on paper.

The State: Discussion about gun violence worth having (Opinion)

<http://www.thestate.com/2013/03/29/2698437/bolton-discussion-about-gun-violence.html>

Warren Bolton

While I'd like to see an assault weapons ban as well as other measures aimed at controlling who can get guns and the fire power available to the man on the street, I'm also well-aware that the man on the street needs some fixing — of the heart and mind variety — if we're going to curb gun atrocities and other violence that's so pervasive in society. Violence is deeply engrained in the American culture, from how we assault one another verbally (just consider our political rhetoric or the way some of us talk to our kids) to domestic and sexual abuse to gun and gang violence; we're among the most violent nations on the planet.

Glenn Adams

Maine is joining South Carolina and several other states in defending a federal law that deals with Indian adoption rights and will be a central topic in a case that goes before the U.S. Supreme Court next month, . Attorney General Janet Mills announced Thursday. Mills said the state signed onto an amicus brief in the case defending the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978. She described the facts of the case as "particularly outrageous," and said the case has implications in Maine where a process is under way to investigate systematic removal of tribal children from their households prior to passage of the Indian Child Welfare law.

Bruce Smith

In a debate days before the GOP runoff for a vacant South Carolina congressional seat, former Charleston County Council member Curtis Bostic on Thursday called former Gov. Mark Sanford a compromised candidate who would give Democrats a chance to win the 1st District seat that Republicans have long controlled. "Trust is a critical issue and it has become a critical issue in this race," Bostic said during a televised debate sponsored by the state Republican Party. "A compromised candidate is not what we need. This seat needs to be held for the conservative cause."

Island Packet: Sanford is 'compromised,' runoff rival argues in debate

Gina Smith

In the first debate between the two Republicans vying to represent the 1st Congressional District, candidate Curtis Bostic characterized Mark Sanford as a "compromised candidate" because of his 2009 secret exit from the state and a "Mr. No" with a record of failing to bring people together to accomplish reforms. Sanford pushed back, saying Bostic voted in favor of Charleston County budgets that increased spending and missing meetings during his time on county council there.

Post and Courier: Bostic attacks Sanford's political effectiveness in Charleston debate

Robert Behre

The issue of whether former Gov. Mark Sanford is a compromised candidate because of his highly publicized 2009 scandal arose yet again Thursday during an hour-long 1st Congressional District debate. But it was Sanford's relative effectiveness as both a three-term congressman and two-term governor that his Republican rival, former Charleston County Councilman Curtis Bostic, dwelled on more.

Post and Courier: Sanford, Bostic agree on policy, but not on each other's records

Natalie Caula

Former pastor and accused serial rapist Dale Richardson has been in jail for nearly two years while he awaits trial. His attorneys want him out on bail, but prosecutors say he would be a danger to the community. Both sides made their arguments during a hearing in Dorchester County on March 13. One of the three women Richardson is accused of raping in 2010 was in the courtroom in opposition to any bail that could lead to his release, according to prosecutors.

Staff Report

Gov. Pat McCrory's campaign is giving another $8,000 to charity, the third time his campaign has unloaded contributions from people facing criminal charges related to sweepstakes cafes. McCrory spokeswoman Kim Genardo said Wednesday the Republican governor's campaign would rid itself of $8,000 brought to their attention by The Associated Press this week. The cash was donated last year by John Patrick Fannin and his wife, who live in Little River, S.C.

It's a good bet that in the not-so-distant future aerial drones will be part of Americans' everyday lives, performing countless useful functions. A far cry from the killing machines whose missiles incinerate terrorists, these generally small, unmanned aircraft will help farmers more precisely apply water and pesticides to crops, saving money and reducing environmental impacts. They'll help police departments find missing people, reconstruct traffic accidents and act as lookouts for SWAT teams. They'll alert authorities to people stranded on rooftops by hurricanes and monitor evacuation flows.

Two sides see risk, slowdown as reasons for scaling back bond purchase program

<http://www.greenvilleonline.com/article/20130329/BUSINESS/303290020/Fed-agrees-cutting-buying>

Ylan Q. Mui

Inside the Federal Reserve, consensus is growing over the need to dial back the central bank's $85 billion-a-month bond-buying program — but for very different reasons. It boils down to two sides: hawks, who want to curtail "quantitative easing" programs because of the risks they create, and doves, who see evidence that they're working well enough at stimulating growth that they might soon be slowed down. First, let's consider the hawks, who worry that the Fed is doing too much to juice the economy. They want to scale back on QE because they are worried that the program's unintended consequences are outweighing any benefits.
