Governor Nikki Haley News:

The State: SC emergency officials say early decisions helped prevent winter storm problems

<http://www.thestate.com/2014/01/31/3238335/sc-emergency-officials-say-early.html>

Joey Holleman

South Carolina emergency officials say the state escaped this week's winter storm relatively pain-free in part because they follow one mantra: Make decisions early so you can manage the situation before the situation manages you. It helped that the worst of the snow and ice arrived after sunset Tuesday or before dawn Wednesday, when most people were safely in their homes.

Note: "This is the first time we've had to play this out, and I'm very, very proud of our team," said Gov. Nikki Haley.

Note: "On Wednesday, I was getting text messages from people saying, 'You were right,'" Haley said. "But it's not about being wrong or right, it's about keeping people safe."

Ask Gov. Nikki Haley and she'll tell you the Palmetto State is becoming known as the "Beast of the Southeast" when it comes to manufacturing. But in 2013, gun manufacturers made their mark on the state, and there's no sign that's about to slow down.

Note: "When you do legislation that goes against a company like that, we've got two or three of them now because of that. Our goal is to stay out of the way of business," said Haley.

The director of South Carolina's Department of Transportation has resigned following a drunken driving arrest. Robert St. Onge resigned Friday, citing personal reasons. Gov. Nikki Haley notified legislative leaders in a letter obtained by The Associated Press that Christy Hall will be acting secretary until she finds a permanent replacement. The Lexington County Sheriff's Department website said St. Onge was arrested Friday and charged with driving under the influence first offense.

S.C. Department of Transportation Secretary Robert St. Onge resigned after he was arrested Friday morning for driving under the influence. He was charged Friday by a S.C. Highway Patrol trooper, according to Lexington County court records.

Note: "General St. Onge is a good man with a lifetime of service to his country, and more recently, our state," Haley spokesman Doug Mayer said. "That said, we have a no tolerance policy for our state agency directors, and so Gen. St. Onge has resigned as Secretary of Transportation. The governor thanks him for his work fixing the serious fiscal issues he inherited at the Department of Transportation – the state is better off because of his service."

The man who led South Carolina's highway department for the past three years has resigned following an arrest for suspected DUI early Friday morning. Robert St. Onge, Jr., was a retired Army general when he was appointed to be Secretary of the Department of Transportation by Gov. Nikki Haley shortly after she took office in 2011. The Governor's Office said he submitted his resignation letter Friday morning.

Note: Haley's spokesman Doug Mayer confirmed the resignation in an email. "General St. Onge is a good man with a lifetime of service to his country, and more recently, our state," Mayer wrote. "That said, we have a no tolerance policy for our state agency directors, and so General St. Onge has resigned as Secretary of Transportation. The governor thanks him for his work fixing the serious fiscal issues he inherited at the Department of Transportation - the state is better off because of his service."

No doubt, Herb Kirsh would have approved of the small, warm, memorial service Friday that honored his life in politics and eight decades of life. Because to remember Herb Kirsh – who at the time he left office in 2010 was the longest-serving legislator (32 years) in the General Assembly – is to hear the voices of all parties and people who not just loved the man, but respected him. He died Tuesday at 84 after a series of falls during the past two months.
