March 7, 2014

Since 2011, our state has been focused on recruiting quality companies to our borders, building up existing businesses, creating jobs and strengthening our workforce. This month, we're continuing to see proof that South Carolina is doing things the right way, and getting the right results.

The South Carolina Department of Employment and Workforce (SCDEW) this week released 2013 figures, proclaiming it "a banner year" for total employment in the state. More South Carolinians were employed by the end of the year than ever before in the state's history. The Palmetto State's jobless rate has dropped below the national average for the first time since 2001, and unemployment has declined by more than 10 percent in some counties. Rounding out the good news, McCormick County became the second county in South Carolina and the sixth in the United States to become a Certified Work Ready Community. These are huge results for our state and our citizens.

In economic development, it's easy to measure success by bottom lines, trends and the number of projects closed. But here in South Carolina, the full impact of our success can be measured by our growing workforce, which proves to the world that it is just right for business.

Commerce Capture: Rural Summit Photography Contest Winner

Jessica Oswald's photo, titled "Palmetto Field," was selected as the winner of the Rural Summit Photography Contest by conference attendees during the 24th Annual Rural Summit.

Oswald's entry was one of more than 90 entries for this year's contest. The entries were narrowed down to five finalist photos by the S.C. Department of Commerce staff and displayed at the Rural Summit. Oswald, of Gilbert County, took the winning photograph showing a symbolic South Carolina palmetto tree, standing alone in a tranquil field.
