We are at a pivotal time in health and human services transformation: Policy reform, technological advances, and a continued need for cost containment are driving a profound shift in HHS business models and service delivery. Around the nation, a new framework for change is gaining momentum as jurisdictions at every level are developing more value-based, outcomes-focused, integrated approaches in healthcare and social programs.

Yet there is a lag between what's technically possible and actual change on the ground. There are real barriers - in policy as well as practice - to implementing modern IT solutions, enabling data sharing, and building new systems of care. There are also trailblazers who are setting ambitious goals and leading comprehensive initiatives to drive better community health and social outcomes.
