House leaders are looking at ideas to fix the state's crumbling infrastructure by turning many state roads over to local control, swapping the gas tax for a sales tax on fuel, and asking voters to decide in 2016 whether to add a penny sales tax for transportation needs.

Note: Simrill said he wants to hear from everyone with a stake in the outcome, including Gov. Nikki Haley, who has said she plans to address lawmakers about her ideas in January.

Note: Haley has not given any clues to her plans since being re-elected this month but has signaled again she will oppose any gas tax increase.

Note: Simrill said he believes Haley wants the governor to be able to appoint not only the secretary but also commissioners, with the consent of lawmakers, making it a true cabinet agency.

Opinion / Editorial Roundup:

Aiken Standard: Survival of MOX still rests with lawmakers

<http://www.aikenstandard.com/article/20141118/AIK0201/141119477/1018/AIK02/editorial-survival-of-mox-still-rests-with-lawmakers>

Editorial

The recent extension given to construction for Savannah River Site's Mixed Oxide Fuel program, or MOX, is a plus, but keeping it alive still falls to federal lawmakers. The program, which would recycle weapons-grade plutonium, certainly hasn't been void of controversy. However, it remains perhaps the most viable option to fulfilling an agreement between South Carolina and the federal government, as well as a long-term international pact concerning the disposal of such waste.

Index Journal: Ethics reform, yes, but term limits too?

<http://www.indexjournal.com/opinion/editorial/Ethics-reform--yes--but-term-limits-too->

Editorial

Ethics reform at the state government level needs to be a priority item among lawmakers going forward, and it certainly warrants bipartisan support because, Heaven knows, it's a bipartisan problem. No one among Republicans or Democrats needs to point an accusatory finger across the aisle. Ethical backsliding has no political party affiliation.

Times and Democrat: Obama would join GOP presidents in immigration action

Editorial

THE ISSUE: Immigration. OUR OPINION: Republicans should avoid hard-line stands in moving toward controlling agenda. Senate Democratic leaders are telling President Barack Obama they strongly support his plans to take executive action to overhaul the nation's immigration system.

Post and Courier: Shutdown is not an option
<http://www.postandcourier.com/article/20141118/PC1002/141119394>

Editorial

The federal government is due to run out of money on Dec. 11. And no matter how justifiably angry Republican lawmakers may be about President Barack Obama's threat to grant executive amnesty to millions of illegal immigrants, it would be a big mistake for this lame duck session to strike back by refusing to extend federal funding until next year, when a new Congress will take over.

Post and Courier: Don't play games with CRDA
<http://www.postandcourier.com/article/20141118/PC1002/141119393>

Editorial

The area's main economic recruiter had good reason to believe it had reached an agreement with the counties it serves - Berkeley, Charleston and Dorchester - but the specifics of that agreement have apparently become a moving target, at least with Charleston County officials.

<http://www.postandcourier.com/article/20141117/PC16/141119437>

Jennifer Berry Hawes

Attorneys for a same-sex Charleston couple have asked a federal court to reject South Carolina Attorney General Alan Wilson's request to keep them from getting married on Thursday when a temporary stay expires. In a historic advance for gay rights in South Carolina, U.S. District Judge Richard Gergel ruled last week that the state's same-sex marriage ban is unconstitutional.

<http://www.thestate.com/2014/11/17/3817887/ag-wilson-same-sex-charleston.html#storylink=cpy>

John Monk

Lawyers for Colleen Condon and Ann Bleckley, in a motion filed just before midnight Sunday, argue gay marriages should be allowed to proceed in South Carolina, because the state is unlikely to win its appeal to block them, and the state has not shown it would suffer harm if such marriages take place.

Post and Courier: Palmetto Sunrise: S.C. awaits gay marriage decision
<http://www.postandcourier.com/article/20141118/PC1603/141119392/1177/palmetto-sunrise-sc-awaits-gay-marriage-decision>

Jeremy Borden

The federal appeal's court in Richmond is expected to rule at any time - possibly today - on whether gay marriages can proceed in South Carolina. The legal heart of the case is whether the court agrees with Attorney General Alan Wilson that the state will suffer if the state's constitutional amendment banning gay marriage is overturned.

Karen Tumulty, Katie Zezima

President Obama's expected action lifting the threat of deportation from millions of undocumented immigrants, which could come as early as this week, will expand the authority of the executive branch into murky, uncharted territory. The path is built on the long-accepted principle, going at least as far back as the 1970s, that any administration should have wide discretion over how it deals with those who are in this country illegally.

Reuters: White House reviewing policy toward U.S. hostages held by militants

In recent months, Islamic State militants have beheaded three Americans, including Peter Kassig, an aid worker and former U.S. Army Ranger, whose death was announced in a video released by the group on Sunday.
