According to U.S. State Department data, 22 Syrian refugees have resettled in the state since June 15. The group is part of President Barack Obama's push to relocate 10,000 Syrian refugees to the country this year. So far around 5,000 have been placed in the country.

South Carolina's population is one of the lowest on the East Coast, but Delaware, Vermont and the District of Columbia have no refugees. North Carolina has the highest amount on the coast.

- Is it fair that the federal government has resettled refugees to South Carolina even though other states have none?
- What has Gov. Haley done to prevent the resettlement of refugees to the state?
- Has her stance toward Syrian refugees since she made comments regarding the resettlement process earlier this year? If so, how?
- Is the governor informed when any refugee is resettled in the state? Was she informed when these resettlements began? If so, how?
- Have the feds given Gov. Haley any indication of how many Syrian refugees are expected this year? If so, how many?

That's what I got for yall right now.

Thanks,

Gavin
